1. On 14 February 1951 a number of propaganda leaflets were distributed in Ljubljana. The leaflets, which were directed particularly to the officers and men of the Yugoslav Army, contained extremely sharp criticism of the Yugoslav Government and expressed dissatisfaction with the support Marshal Tito has received recently from the West. Soldiers were admonished that, in the event Yugoslavia were to be involved in another war, they should not make the same mistake they made in 1941 when they surrendered their arms. Instead, they were urged to shoot down first of all the Communists, particularly the political commissars in the Army and the UDB representatives. If a military commission consisting of British, French, and American officers arrived in Yugoslavia, the soldiers were urged to kill the British officers, but to open negotiations with the Americans and the French. In the event complete confusion ensued as a result of the invasion of Yugoslavia from either the West or the East, the soldiers were instructed to flee into the woods, taking their arms with them.
2. In recent months the Russians have been attempting to establish liaison with Chetnik groups inside Yugoslavia. It is not known whether these efforts have met with any success.
